ESSAY.

When we use "going to" in a sentence to refer to the future, the construction is made up of three elements: the verb "to be" conjugated according to the subject + "going" + the infinitive of the main verb. The use of "going to" to refer to future events suggests a very strong link with the present. The precise moment is not relevant, it is later than now, but the attitude implies that said event depends on something we know about the current situation. "Going to" is mostly used to talk about our plans and intentions, or to make predictions based on current evidence. In everyday speech, "going to" is often shortened to "gonna", especially in American English, although it is never spelled that way.
