The film focuses on lawyer Fletcher Reede, who often overpromises to win cases and money. He is, in short, an unethical lawyer, who would do anything to continue advancing his career, even if it means lying so as not to see his son Max.

Fletcher is separated from Audrey, who has another partner but prefers to maintain a cordial relationship with his ex-partner. However, the constant excuses of Jim Carrey's character to be an absent father drive her mad and she decides to leave town.

In parallel to the family issue, Fletcher is taking a case of complaint of a woman against the father of her children. She is doing everything she can to take more money from him so that he cannot see his little ones. Although it is an impossible case, the lawyer deceives his client by promising that they can get a lot out of ex-partner, who is a wealthy man.

In between these two situations, the film takes a fantastic turn when the wish of little Max is fulfilled.

His five-year-old son, fed up with broken promises, makes a wish on his birthday, so that his father cannot lie for twenty-four hours.

It is a movie that leaves us many teachings, the importance of not lying and you have to have professional ethics, recommended to see it as a family.
