The Day I Almost Failed Probability

Introduction

I was always good at math, but probability was never my strong suit. During my last semester of high school, I had to take the final exam, which would determine whether I passed the class or not. I had worked hard studying, but a simple mistake with the schedule almost ruined everything.

Development

The night before the exam, I was reviewing formulas and exercises in my room when my mother asked me to go with her to the supermarket. While she shopped, I mentally reviewed the most difficult topics. Suddenly, I received a text from my teacher reminding me that the exam started at 8:00 a.m. I thought it was strange because I was sure it was at 10:00 a.m., but when I checked the schedule, I realized I had made a serious mistake.

I barely slept that night because I was worried. I set three alarms to stay awake, but the next day, I woke up to find it was 7:45 a.m. I had inadvertently turned off my alarms! I got dressed as quickly as possible and ran out the door without having breakfast. As I ran to school, all I could think about was that if I was late, I would lose my chance to pass the class.

When I got to the classroom, the teacher was about to close the door. Breathing heavily, I begged him to let me in. Luckily, he understood the situation and allowed me to take the exam.

Conclusion

That day, I learned a great lesson about the importance of organization and punctuality. Despite the scare, I managed to do well on the exam and pass probability. Since then, I always double-check my schedule and rely less on my memory.
